STRICKLAND PUBLICITY

We have received very good coverage in newspaper genealogical columns of Georgia, Florida and Texas. Two columnists who have mentioned our organization several times deserve our support. They are:

ELIZABETH S. ALLIGOOD - "Tracing Family Histories" ?
News Daily of Clayton County
138 Church Street
Jonesboro, Georgia 30236

JOEL DIXON WELLS - "Know Your Kin"
Fayette Sun
335 N. Glynn Street
Fayetteville, Georgia 30214

They are most cooperative, and will gladly print any queries on Campbell, Coweta, Clayton, Fayette, Henry and surrounding counties.

THE STRICKLAND OIL CONTROVERSY

by

Mrs. W. E. (Rita) Nickels

The citizens of Conroe, Texas, had never seen anything like it. Suddenly, without any warning other than scattered rumors that a big trial was brewing, their town had been invaded by a horde of pesky strangers who had taken over like a swarm of locusts. The intruders were as rapacious as locusts, too; though it wasn't food they wanted. They were after money--royalties on the oil being pumped from Conroe's recently discovered bonanza. Specifically, their attention was focused on a tract of land that had been granted in 1838 to a man named WILSON STRICKLAND.

Strickland, a pioneer who had come to Texas when it was still a part of Mexico, had arrived in 1829, and vanished in the 1840s. If he left any trace of his subsequent location or an eventual marriage, no one has ever found it. Nevertheless, each of the strangers who invaded Conroe in 1941 was bent on proving that he was a descendant of the man. The person or persons who could perform that feat were due to make a fortune, for royalties were piling up daily in the coffers of Humble Oil & Refining Company.

When the Conroe field opened in the 1930s, Humble leased the Strickland survey from a family of Vinces claiming to be the owners. Though the Vinces' title to the property was dubious, Humble had accepted it and disbursed some royalties. The company's attorneys, becoming increasingly nervous about the lease, had discontinued the Vinces' payments and advertised for Strickland heirs. The response had been overwhelming. Hundreds of "heirs" had come forward clamoring to be recognized. Finding themselves awash in a sea of unsubstantiated claims, Humble's lawyers had taken depositions from everyone and eased them out the door. That should have been the end of the matter, but, as it turned out, the drama was just beginning. Humble had opened a Pandora's box and it was too late to close the lid.

As word of a potential fortune spread, the Strickland case escalated to a cause celebre. All over the country genealogists went on the prowl for clues to the shadowy grantee's identity. Every likely source of information was consulted--courthouse records, old cemeteries, the vague and faltering memories of a corps of octogenarians. And, all the time this was going on, aspirants to the title of heir continued to besiege Humble's lawyers. The shrewder ones grought along lawyers of their own, having learned from their predecessors' experiences that enthusiasm by itself carried little clout.

At the height of the turmoil, John Vince flabbergasted everyone by filing a suit against Humble to recover his royalties. It was this climactic move that triggered the invasion of Conroe and brought matters to a head. For eleven incredible months, a melange of witnesses, reporters, and curiosity seekers streamed through the courtroom; and, during the marathon, the long-suffering jury heard the testimony of some fifty witnesses. Only rarely was the tedium relieved by an entertaining incident like the one provided by a woman who entered the courtroom pushing a wheelbarrow containing the remnants of a coffin. In that coffin, asserted the lady as if daring anyone to contradict her, her Wilson Strickland had been buried. How this was supposed to prove her descent from Wilson the grantee is not made clear in the records. The jury didn't grasp the connection either, but they enjoyed the amusing performance.

So voluminous was the evidence submitted that an expert on forged documents was brought in to rule on its authenticity. The expert, Clark Sellers, examined the items one by one and pronounced the majority of them fraudulent. Some of the forgeries were so amateurish that they screamed of spurious origins. Letters purporting to be nineteenth century missives had been written on twentieth century stationery. "Old" documents were penned in ink much too fresh to be authentic. Falsified Bible records yielded up their secrets to infra red rays revealing particles of graphite which had been ground into the paper when the original pencil writing had been erased to make room for fictitious entries.

Forgeries such as these were easy to detect; others were more challenging. Probably the most expert of the lot was a forged tombstone belonging to some Stricklands from Georgia. The stone itself did not appear in court, having mysteriously vanished shortly before the trial began; but, its owners just happened to have a snapshot which they were happy to show to Sellers. The picture showed a large stone slab inscribed "In Memory Of Wilson Strickland," followed by the dates of birth and death (1807 & 1847). At first glance, the inscription seemed to be innocent enough, but when Sellers scrutinized it more closely he detected a slight incongruity in the lettering of the names. The Strickland appeared to be authentic, as did the first three letters of Wilson, but the remaining three letters didn't match up precisely. Was it possible that the name had been altered to make it suit the photographer's purposes?

Sellers didn't know whether a tombstone could be forged, but he decided to find out. Commandeering an old stone no one wanted, he filled the old letters with putty and carved new ones in their stead, discovering as he worked that it was surprisingly easy to cut the timeworn surface. When he was through, he tested his handiwork by photographing it from various angles and under various light conditions. Some of the pictures that resulted were remarkably convincing, certainly good enough to fool the average eye. Though the cautious Sellers later declined to label the Stricklands' snapshot an outright hoax, he did venture an opinion that the name on their stone had originally read Willis H. Strickland.

When all of the testimony had been heard and all of the evidence disposed of in one way or another, the weary jury retired to its quarters. After some deliberation it decided to award

John Vince a settlement of $300,000. That was the end of the jury's job, arbitration of land disputes being outside its province; however, it was opined privately that none of the witnesses, be they Stricklands or Vinces, had produced firm proof of their right to claim Wilson Strickland's land. As for the Stricklands who had taken part in the trial...they went home emptyhanded and convinced in their own minds that they had been ripped off. Even in those days oil companies were suspected of being heartless villains who had no sympathy for the little man.

Who was Wilson Strickland? The question has never been answered satisfactorily due to a scarcity of information about the man. The only indisputable facts are those which are documented in the records of the Texas Archives and the General Land Office. Strickland, unmarried and evidently illiterate, came to Texas in 1829. He fought in the Texas Revolution of 1836 and was awarded a bounty grant in Kaufman County (which he promptly assigned to his comrade-in-arms John A. Greer). In 1838, he applied for and received a first class headright in Harrisburg (later Harris, now Montgomery) County.<sup>1</sup> This was the Conroe grant, as it is commonly called. To obtain it, Wilson followed the standard procedure prescribed by the Republic of Texas; appearing before the Board of Land Commissioners for Harrisburg County, he stated under oath that he was a single man who had come to Texas in 1829, hence he was entitled to one third of a league of land. A certificate to that effect was duly issued by the examining board. Numbered 423 and dated March 16, 1838, the certificate was nothing more than a permit for Wilson to select his allotted acreage from the public lands available. Before he could obtain a patent on the land, he would have to locate his tract, have it surveyed, and file a claim at the appropriate courthouse.

For reasons that are now unknown, Wilson hired a man named Allen Vince to handle these matters for him. On April 16, 1838, the two men signed a contract whereby Strickland, signing with an X, agreed to give Vince one half of the property if Vince would take care of the necessary procedures and pay all expenses involved. This Vince did, albeit slowly. Due mainly to procrastination by the surveyor, it was not until July 3, 1847, that a patent was issued by the General Land Office in Austin.

At this point the records introduce a startling development. Almost as soon as the patent was issued, Allen Vince petitioned the court of Harris County to assign the Conroe survey to him. Strickland, explained Vince, had not honored his agreement to give half of the property to Vince, nor had he paid a debt of $200 which he owed Vince for money loaned and board furnished, a debt which had been secured by an additional lien on the Conroe tract. In view of these defaults, Vince felt he had the right to take over Strickland's land. The court agreed, but only after publishing an eight-weeks' citation in the Harris County "Telegraph" so Strickland, who was "now absent from the State and hence beyond the reach of personal service," could be advised of the charges against him. When the eight weeks were up and Strickland had not been heard from, the court ruled in favor of the plaintiff. Now the land was Vince's, or would be as soon as he filed title to it at the Montgomery County courthouse.

Incredibly, Vince never filed a title. His failure to do so is baggling, as he was an experienced trader who had acquired modest wealth by dealing in land, livestock and slaves. Surely he must have known he was supposed to obtain a deed to his newly acquired property. Why didn't he do so? Various speculations have been offered: 1) he died unexpectedly before he had a chance to go to Conroe; 2) he put off the trip till a more convenient time and it eventually skipped his mind; 3) he simply didn't bother because the land wasn't worth the trouble.<sup>2</sup> Whatever his motives may have been, Vince didn't file title and his omission became a point of much contention at the trial in 1941.

The Strickland factions, ceasing their infighting long enough to gang up on the Vinces, charged that Allen Vince had never officially owned the land, therefore, his descendants had no business being in the courtroom. Oh yes they did, replied the Vinces; the 1847 judgment of the Harris County court was as binding as any deed. We'll see about that, countered the Stricklands; we'll request a court ruling on the validity of that old judgment.

The threat was never carried out and the question of true ownership remains unanswered to this day. Undoubtedly it would present difficulties for anyone who might wish to reopen the case, but there is no indication anyone intends to do so. Such an action would probably prove fruitless, as it is doubtful that royalties could be collected after all these years. But, curiosity about Wilson Strickland's identity runs as high as ever. Scarcely a month goes by without the General Land Office receiving at least one inquiry from some researcher who yearns to know what secrets lurk within Wilson's file. The sleuths must be disappointed to learn the file contains only four documents, none of which contain biographical data other than Wilson's statement of his marital status and date of immigration. Yet, countless researchers have poured over them and the paper has been worn thin. The General Land Office was finally compelled to laminate them to prevent their gradual destruction.

Who was WILSON STRICKLAND? Where did he come from? Where did he go? These are questions that will probably be asked for many years to come...and will probably never be answered.

Footnotes:

1. Headrights in Texas were divided into 4 classes, depending on the date of the applicant's arrival in Texas. First Class grants were reserved for settlers who had immigrated before 1836. They conveyed one league of land (4,428 acres) to married grantees and one third of a league (1,476 acres) to single grantees. In pioneer days, when everyone was scrambling to claim land, surveyors were not always fastidious about honoring one another's markers. This resulted in a hodgepodge of overlapping surveys that had to be straightened out tediously through the years. When all the corrections were finished, the Strickland tract was left with 495 acres.

2. This theory isn't...

wasn't especially desirable, as it was unfit for farming. Throughout its early history it remained a deserted wilderness. In 1893, a man who had acquired a deed of sorts subdivided the property and sold a few lots to some gullible buyers, but all the buyers ever did with their property was put up some cabins and cut a little timber. So far as old timers around Conroe can remember, the land served no serious purpose until oil was struck there in the thirties.

Rita Nickels, a member from Austin, TX., spent many hours at the Texas Archives and the General Land Office researching the available documents pertaining to WILSON STRICKLAND and the Strickland oil suit. It took many more hours to put the bits and pieces together in order to write the article presented in this issue. Thank you, Rita, for sharing your research and your article with us. -NJC.

STRICKLAND REUNIONS

June 29, 1980
Carroll County, Georgia

The descendants of Rev. William Henry Strickland (b. 1839 d. 1901) and Sarah Cornelia Dunlap Strickland met for dinner on Sunday, June 29th, in Carroll County, Georgia. There were 48 in attendance. Sarah Fulton was the oldest descendant attending, and her great grand niece was the youngest.

The following release was sent to the Gainesville (FL) Sun, Jesup Sentinel, Kennesaw Neighbor, Atlanta Journal/Constitution, Waycross Journal/Herald, and the Blackshear Times.

STRICKLAND REUNION

The descendants of Alfred Cutherbert Strickland -- born January 15, 1831 - died June 27, 1910, recently held their annual family reunion in Jesup, Georgia. Relatives from as far away as Denver, Colorado and Baltimore, Maryland attended the pot-luck dinner and annual election of Strickland family organization officers. The 1980-1981 officers are: President-Alice Strickland Blocker of Jesup, Georgia, Vice-President-Lois Strickland Clark of Decatur, Georgia, Secretary-Treasurer-Sidney L. Strickland of Savannah, Georgia, Chaplain-Harley Strickland of Hortense, Georgia, Publications-Malcolm Strickland of Kennesaw, Georgia, Historian-Stella Dampier of Gainesville, Florida, and Chaplain Emeritus-Alfred C. Strickland of Blackshear, Georgia. Host of the event at Jesup's Cracker Williams Recreation Center was Sidney L. Strickland. Mr. Strickland introduced Alfred C. Strickland (84) as the oldest family member present, and Brent Middleton (5 mos.), son of Mary and Larry Middleton as the youngest attendee. Seven direct descendant family lines were represented at the gathering. If you have any historical information relating to this A. C. Strickland family of Georgia, please contact Mrs. Ruby (Stella) Dampier, 303-21st St. S.E., Gainesville, Florida 32601.

QUARTERLY PROJECT: "NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS"

This quarter's project of "newspaper clippings" is one in which every member can become involved. Not only are we interested in old newspaper clippings, but current ones as well. Today's news will be tomorrow's genealogical "treasure."

Search your newspapers for marriages, obituaries and articles about the Stricklands and allied families. Remember to include the name of the paper, and the dateline (usually found at the top of the page). If you have old clippings you wish to keep, send us a clear zerox copy--also with dateline.

Do not write on the clipping. If an explanation is needed, please place it on a separate page.

This quarter's project will end on October 15th. Certificates of Historical Merit will be awarded at the Annual Meeting on October 26th to the members who participate.
